How to use your 90 days

A plan you can revise without starting over.

Before the first week

Use the eight starting exercises to choose one focus. You do not have to fill every box. Set your Day 1 date and count forward to Day 90. Week 1 covers Days 1-7, Week 12 covers Days 78-84, and Week 13 covers Days 85-90: six days.

Plan, act, review

Each week has a planning page and a review page. Choose up to three useful actions, put them into real time windows and define a smaller fallback. At the end, record evidence and one adjustment. Complete the Day 30, 60 and 90 checkpoints when those dates arrive; they appear after the weekly pages so they are easy to find.

Choose your format

The Digital PDF has writable fields. Save a copy in a form-capable PDF reader, enter a short answer, save and reopen to test it. Keep answers concise and use the notes pages for longer writing. Browser/mobile preview support varies. The Print A4 edition has ruled spaces; print at actual size or use Fit and check the margins.

Start date and pacing

Write your start and checkpoint dates on the milestone page. You can use calendar days or intentionally restart a season after a major interruption. Keep that choice explicit. This workbook supports personal organization, not a guaranteed transformation.

Where life stands

Name the facts before designing the future.

Change becomes easier to work with when it is specific. Describe your current situation in ordinary language: what you do, who relies on you, what takes time and what is uncertain. Separate facts from predictions. A difficult week is evidence about that week, not a verdict on your whole life.

Look for an area where a small change would remove recurring friction. You can leave areas outside your control unscored and unresolved. The purpose is to choose attention, not inventory every problem.

What is working in work, relationships, wellbeing and practical life?

What feels costly or out of alignment? Which part is within my influence?

What deserves attention in this 90-day season, and what can wait?

One meaningful focus

Choose an outcome without pretending to control everything.

A focus links a reason to an observable change. You might explore a new role by speaking with three people, rebuild a routine through two planned walks, or reduce administrative stress by creating a weekly review. Avoid goals that depend entirely on another person agreeing.

Define evidence of progress, then define a process you control. A 90-day plan is a working hypothesis. You may revise it when evidence or circumstances change.

My focus / Why it matters in this season

What progress would look like by Day 90 / What I can directly do

What is outside this plan, and how will I recognize scope creep?

Week 1: Begin with evidence

Days 1-7 / Dates: _____

What is one assumption I can test this week? Tie the week to your 90-day focus, then choose actions that fit your current capacity. Three actions are a maximum, not a quota.

This week matters because / One observable result I will work toward

Action 1 / Time window / What must be ready

Action 2 or 3, only if useful / Time windows / Limits

Likely obstacle / My smaller fallback / What I will protect

Week 1: notice and adjust

Review date: _____

Separate what happened from what I expected. Distinguish an incomplete action from an unhelpful goal. An action may need a clearer cue, more information, a smaller scope or a deliberate end.

What happened? Actions attempted, results and one specific example

What helped or created friction? What did I learn about the plan?

Continue / Change / Stop: one choice and the evidence behind it

My next action / Cue / Fallback / Next review date

Day 30: take stock

Pause the weekly rhythm long enough to see the pattern.

Revisit your starting focus and the evidence you wanted by Day 30. Compare the situation now with the actual starting point. Include changes in circumstances, not only changes in effort. Choose the next phase from what you know now.

Evidence of progress / What remains uncertain / What changed around me

What has this focus cost in time, energy or money? Is the trade-off still acceptable?

Keep, narrow, redirect or close? My decision and the reason

My next milestone or closing action / Support / Review date
